It now has a small scrap of paper that is worth a discount at the store, but you cannot get cash directly from a coupon. The store has to mail the coupon to the manufacturer to receive reimbursement for processing, typically 8 cents per coupon.

Is a coupon equivalent to cash?

A coupon is equivalent to cash. For example, if you have a $1.00 off coupon on a box of cereal, the cashier takes the coupon as though it were cash. Although it's not common anymore, some stores will even double a coupon's face value. Once the cashier accepts the coupon, the store has a problem.

Can a store coupon be used on multiple items?

A store coupon can be used on multiple items because it is handled differently from a manufacturer's coupon. The savings is absorbed by the store and therefore, using it on more than one item generally does not breach the general coupon guidelines. Only one manufacturer's coupon can be used per item.

Does this store have a coupon policy?

Every store has a coupon policy specific to its location. Interpretation of the corporate coupon policy by employees can also impact how customers can redeem coupons, even within the same store chain in the same city and state.

How many coupons can a store accept?

A store's coupon acceptance policies can vary. Some stores have a limit on the number of coupons they accept, such as only five internet-printed coupons. Other stores may accept an unlimited number. The number of coupons a store accepts can depend on the type of coupons being used. Some stores have a dollar limit on the coupons they accept.

How do you use coupons at a grocery store?

To use coupons at a grocery store, first, you take the coupons to the store. The cashier treats them as though they were cash. For example, if you have a $1.00 off coupon on a box of cereal, the cashier will subtract the value of the coupon when calculating the total cost of your purchase.
